Microchip

A microchip is a small, permanent chip, about the size of a grain of rice. It is inserted under the skin, between the animal's shoulder blades by means of a syringe. The chip can be detected with a scanner, which gives a numerical identification that is used to identify the pet and its owner.

Complications of microchip insertion are similar to that of a vaccination. There is a small risk of bleeding and/or infection at the site of microchip injection. You will need to examine the site of injection over the next week. If you notice swelling, excessive bleeding, or discharge from the site; you will need to take the animal to a veterinarian for an examination and possible treatment. By agreeing to microchip implantation, you agree to assume full responsibility for treatment of any complications.

I understand that there is a small risk of bleeding and/or infection at the site of microchip injection. I agree to assume full responsibility for any veterinary care my pet may require as a result of microchip implantation. I further agree to release the Lycoming County SPCA of and from any and all liability.
